A. S. LONGLEY, Secretary

Happiness is the enjoyment of goodness, truth and usefulness, without thought of merit or recompense, and for the sake of others. It is the gift of God to those whose hearts are open to it. It is a spiritual condition, from the love of use, filling the spiritual man and flowing down into and making delightful the duties and opportunities in the natural world. True happiness is not from rest and idleness and indulgence, but from useful activity which brings help and joy to others. Selfishness prevents God's full presence and guidance in the heart, and so destroys the possibility of the deepest happiness. All happiness depends upon love of God and one's neighbor. The highest attainment of earthly happiness is love towards God, charity towards our neighbor. The true happiness of man is independent of earthly station, because his love to God and his neighbor does not depend thereon; not wealth, honor, health or power can bring happiness unless the heart is moved by unselfish love, according to the two great Commandments.

Saints are men of character. A man has character when he is conscientious; when he is not moved by every passing impulse or feeling, but by a fixed will to do always what is right and good; when he does not go where it is easiest to go, but where it is his duty to go; when he controls his passions; when he has religious convictions.

Support: The church's only means of support is from the voluntary contributions from members of the congregation. No one is asked to be as generous as possible. All regular contributors are urged to take sittings.

If men would stand up for their religion like they do for their politics, how soon the lion and the lamb would lie down together.
